

I have been working in New York, Boston, Los Angeles, and Houston as an actor, director, and playwright for over twenty-five years. That may seem like a lot of hyphenates, but really, I have only one job title: I'm a storyteller. It's all about the story. When I first started acting, it was because I wanted to be part of the story. When I began writing, it was because I found an original story that needed to be told. When I became a director, it was because I wanted to help share someone else's story that needed to be heard. After earning a BFA from Boston University, I accrued some stage credits in New York performing one-man shows, directing original plays in the East Village, and seeing plays of mine performed in Brooklyn. Eventually, I also earned an MFA in Theatre Directing from Brooklyn College. Now, I'm back in my hometown, Houston, Texas, where I'm still writing, still acting, still telling stories.
